Horizontal Wood Blinds are a traditional favorite for home décor and are now made from a variety of wood, faux wood, composite wood and even leather.

The Horizontal Wood Blind is the one window treatment that offers a wide range of light and privacy options. The actual wood that is used to make these functional blinds is vast and spans from the stable bass and poplar woods, to all the hardwoods, such as oak and maple, with painted, stained, satin and high gloss finishes. The other materials range from faux wood, a type of plastic mix, composite wood, a mix of wood and plastic, all the way to leather! Yes, Leather, it is the high end of the price spectrum and is great for your office space or den.

How Do Horizontal Wood Blinds Work?

The Horizontal Wood blind consist of a headrail, which contains all the hardware that tilts and raises the slat material. The slat material is usually 2in wide and has long route hole punched in specified intervals. The slats are supported by string ladders that are attached to support barrels located in the headrail. Then lift cords are passed through a cord locking device in the headrail, through holes in the headrail, then trough the route holes in the slats, all the way down to a bottom slat that is thick enough to act as a weight. These cords are pulled upon to raise and lower the bottom slat, thereby raising and lowering all the slats. A tilting device is attached to a square rod that passes through the support barrels in the headrail, so that when the tilting device turns the square rod, it turns the support barrels, thereby tilting the slat material. The standard controls are cord operated and these blinds can be motorized.

Horizontal Wood Blinds cover most windows and doors and usually cover large windows by using multiple blinds.
