Vertical Blinds creates a stylish and classic look that has improved with time. The choice of material for this affordable product is endless.

The Vertical Blind has been the standard for sliding glass doors and large window spans for years. The materials used are mostly PVC and fabric vanes, with the higher priced wood vanes as a final choice. The vertical is always the economical choice for large expanses of windows in offices and apartment buildings. The materials are always changing with the mood of whatever the current décor trend is. Some of the newer trends include jacquard fabric vanes, textured PVC vanes and vanes composed of string material that gives the feeling of living in the Caribbean.

How Do Vertical Blinds Work?

The Vertical Blind consist of a top mounted track that contains carriers that move and tilt vanes which hang vertically. The track's carriers move using either a pantograph system or a linked spacer system. The pantograph track or better know as the scissor track is the most common and easy to manufacture. The spacer track stacks the vanes tighter when the blind is opened and the carriers have what is called a self aligning feature. The carriers controls the stems that protrude downwards past the bottom of the track so the vertical vanes can hang from these stems. The vertical vanes are made of PVC, various fabrics or wood. The PVC and fabric vanes have many colors and textures, while the wood vanes consist of short wood segments that are hinged together. The controls are a traverse cord that moves the carriers from side to side and a tilt chain that will tilt the vanes closed or open. The vanes can stack to one side of the window, equally on both sides or stack in the middle.

Vertical Blinds can cover most window sizes and even angled windows. They are best used for windows and doors that slide to one side.
